Voyager 2's Saturn Flyby: A 1981 Milestone

On 25 August 1981, NASA's Voyager 2 probe executed its closest approach to Saturn, arriving just four years and five days after launching from Florida's Kennedy Space Center. This pivotal flyby marked a critical phase in the spacecraft's grand tour of the outer planets. The probe continuously transmitted images and data back to Earth, expanding humanity's understanding of the ringed giant and its moons. This event set the stage for subsequent encounters with Uranus and Neptune.

Voyager 2's journey did not end at Saturn. The probe continued outward, eventually crossing the heliopause into interstellar space on 5 November 2018. Despite an antenna misalignment in July 2023, contact was reestablished by August. As of August 2025, the spacecraft remains operational, traveling outbound at 3.3 AU per year. Engineers hope a power reduction strategy will extend its mission through 2026, keeping it active 46 years after launch.
